

Shocked by reality of abortion

Re: "Anti-abortion protest irks parents," The Nugget, Sept 28.

I am a student who saw the abortion protest at a high school in North Bay. When I first saw the posters of abortion I was shocked. My reaction was one of disgust that people would show such violence in public, but then my thoughts changed as I faced the reality of such horror.

Not how can people show this, but rather how can people allow this to happen to babies? As I read the literature I learned that the babies are dismembered or burned to death by chemicals. There is no law to protect a child in the womb at any age from such a horrible death. More than 100,000 babies are killed by abortion each year in Canada — many of them right here in North Bay.

In the article the issue is side-tracked by people talking of young children seeing the posters. It is sad that innocent young children can't be sheltered from the truth that many of their peers have been aborted. I don't think that a child being curious or briefly saddened compares to children being killed. It is a shame that adults can't be like the young children and see the evil of such murder. Linda Dick is planning to go to city council to request a bylaw banning the demonstrations. I think she should go to city council to request a bylaw banning abortion.
