

Abortion photo writers felt only for themselves

AUG. 4 1998 STANWICK

A number of people wrote to The Standard saying they were upset because it printed gruesome pictures of an anti-abortion group carrying posters of a dissected fetus — the result of an abortion. It is good these people were upset, but unfortunately they are upset for the wrong reasons. They are "shooting the messenger."

The article was well written and worthwhile. The Standard has no reason to apologize; it only performed its duty, it published the facts. If it were not for The Standard's picture, many people would not comprehend how horrible abortion is, a fact which pro-abortionists hide from the public.

The only negative thing that came of the article is it showed complacency of the public toward abortion. It is too bad the number of demonstrators was not 60,000 instead of just 60. It is also too bad that all Christian church leaders, groups, organizations and all who profess to be against abortion did not give credence to this small and devoted group of protesters — especially the Campaign for Life and Right to Life, since the very reason for their existence is to stop abortions.

The people who wrote saying they were disturbed by the pictures were thinking only of themselves. This is similar to those who fight for animal rights while at the same time ignoring human rights.

We should tell our federal and provincial politicians that if they do not have the moral fibre to give rights to unborn children, then we will find politicians that do.

The best solution to this issue is stop the abortions and there will be no such pictures to upset anyone.
